State landfill rules to add safety, cost

By RON FRENCH
Of The News-Sentinel

The state's dumping grounds will be safer — and more expensive — when 200 pages of regulations on Indiana's landfills go into effect Dec. 10.

The new rules contain more stringent environmental protection standards. Landfill operators also must set money aside — previously required only for hazardous waste landfills — to close the landfill.

"It's going to have quite an impact both in the way of operation and the cost of operation," said Doug Johnson, general manager of United Refuse, 5000 Smith Road.

More than 5 million tons of residential, commercial, institutional and industrial waste are generated each year in Indiana. According to Catherine Lynch, spokeswoman for the Indiana Department of Environmental Management, the solid waste regulations will help ensure that the landfills that handle that trash do not pose a threat to public health.

The regulations will be phased in over 18 months at the state's 81 operating sanitary landfills, Lynch said. Any new landfills will have to meet the standards before opening.

The regulations call for more stringent daily maintenance of the landfills and require testing of ground water to see whether waste is seeping into the water system. The regulations also spell out mandatory methane recovery and management methods.

Most expensive for the operators of landfills is a requirement to set aside money to properly close their sites. Johnson said the minimum that must be set aside to help close a landfill is $5,000 an acre. In a landfill with 80 acres of garbage — a typical size — that would be $400,000. That same landfill would have to set aside at least $80,000 more for what is called "post-closure" costs — money used to fix any problems in the landfill that occur within 10 years of the closure. Landfills will have to increase their dumping fees because of the regulations. Carl Hornberger, division manager of National Serv-All, said he expects rates to double or triple within two years.

National Serv-All must set aside $800,000 for closure of its landfill at MacBeth Road. Hornberger favors the regulation predicts that smaller landfills, such as operated in rural counties, may be rather than come up with the closure money.

"Any county running a landfill will a good, hard look (at closing)," he said. "There should be no immediate effect on the city's trash pickup — contracts through August."
